

The flexible working debate goes on.....

There is clearly a split as to whether employees think remote access is a good or bad thing. However, if one of the main complaints is the ability to switch off, then perhaps some employers might consider a ban on working outside of designated fixed hours?

What's for sure, however, is that a clear, well thought out and consistently applied policy, is going to be a step in the right direction.

{

One-third of UK workers (32%) say that remote access to work means they cannot switch off in their personal time, according to research. The survey, conducted by the CIPD and Halogen Software, found that workers are divided on whether remote access to the workplace is a positive or negative development.

PT <http://www.personneltoday.com/hr/remote-access-at-work-means-staff-cant-switch-off/>

