

The worker's revolution is on hold.....for now

I had written before the election, about how both main parties were scrambling for worker votes by offering significant increases in worker protection. However, it appears much of that has now gone by the way side. There was very little of substance with regard employment law in the Queen's speech. It seems that if there is going to be any major change in this Parliament, it will be mainly to do with the Gig Economy and the definition of worker (which is currently undergoing a review). Still, with the political environment so uncertain this may change very quickly. Stay tuned!

In the Queen's Speech today, many of the Conservative Manifesto pledges relating to Employment law have been dropped, and even those that remain are mentioned in extremely vague terms.

 <https://www.blakemorgan.co.uk/news-events/news/queens->